

Quanta System looks to the future with confidence

2020 has been a complex year, marked by a global health crisis, which has created difficulties for and required sacrifices on the part of many companies. However, in handling the emergency, certain Italian businesses were able to take advantage of the opportunities offered by this "stress test" to improve their internal organisation and strengthen their team spirit.

This is the case of Quanta System, a company from Varese which has been active in the research and production of laser technologies for surgery, aesthetic medicine and the preservation of works of art since 1985. Over the last few decades it has seen constant growth, and today it is one of the sector's global leaders, with a staff of 200 professionals.

And Quanta did not slow down during the exceptional pandemic emergency that arose in 2020. Thanks to an agreement entered into by the company with its employees, representing an interesting example of work management in the age of the pandemic, the company adopted extraordinary measures and enacted an internal restructuring, reorganising its operating procedures and physical spaces, to enable all personnel to continue to work in complete safety.

“2020 was if nothing else a difficult year, which brought to the fore the real values of Quanta, strengthening team spirit and causing all of our colleagues to give the most of themselves, without holding back”

General Manager Girolamo Lionetti.

“We have shown ourselves to be a company with character, with a strong collective spirit. Therefore, I am expressing my heartfelt thanks to our entire staff who with a spirit of sacrifice and a sense of responsibility enabled Quanta to never stop operating, while continuing to meet its high quality standards. I would also like to thank our customers, who believed in our company and continued to place their confidence in us”.

“People, with their human and professional capital, are highly valued at Quanta and have always represented the heart of our company”

Operations Director Costantino Cavalli.

“Therefore, we first of all worked on protecting the health of all of our employees, not only by sanitising our work environment, but also through a veritable physical restructuring of our company. Quanta System decided to make recourse to remote working methods for roughly half of its personnel and divided work into two shifts for Production, warehouse and Research & Development staff, who need to work in person.

This”, Cavalli continued, “along with scrupulous respect for health and hygiene regulations, made it possible to optimise the organisation of internal environments and guaranteed to all of our colleagues still working in person the possibility to work safely, with more peace of mind and with more available space”. Now, for the upcoming 2021, a goal shared by the top company officers and the entire management is to take their cue from the inspiration and significant experience that this exceptional situation has generated within the company, from smart working to shift work, to take advantage of them in the future as well, even when the emergency is behind us, in order to improve the internal organisation of work, without ever stopping research and production activities.

“We expect 2021 to be a complex year as well, but we are confident” concluded Lionetti.

“For Quanta, looking to the future also means working to develop new methods and technologies, to intervene in the human body and works of art effectively, precisely and as non-invasively as possible. We will continue with the same passion and dedication to design and produce laser systems to improve people's quality of life, while capitalising on the experience and sacrifices of these recent months. The emergency we are experiencing requires companies to be highly flexible: I am certain that, thanks to everyone's collaboration and commitment, Quanta System will be able to overcome this challenge as well, and come out of it stronger”.
